MEMORANDA CONCERNING THE GENERAL SOCIETY OF COLONIAL WARS AND OTHER STATE SOCIETIES

The General Society was organized May 9th and 10th, 1893, in the Governor's Room, City Hall, New York, by delegates from five States and the District of Columbia. It consists of the Societies now existing and such other State Societies as may from time to time be duly organized and authorized by the General Society. It has sole power of action in the National, as distinct from the State, affairs of the organization. It has jurisdiction to pass upon all questions of eligibility referred to it by the Registrar-General. It does not otherwise interfere in the regulations of government of any State Society, unless by a plurality vote of the General Assembly, when the surrender of the charter of a State Society may be demanded, should an investigation show that such action is necessary for the welfare of the Societies at large. It has power to grant charters in States other than those in which the Society is already organized. It issues the insignia and the diplomas of membership, and publishes the Annual Register with the co-operation of the several State Societies, the cost being defrayed by the latter in proportion to their membership.

The General Council is composed of all the General Officers, and exercises the powers of the General Society (except those of demanding State Charters and of amending the Constitution) between meetings of the General Assembly, to which latter body it regularly reports all its transactions. The General Council meets semi-annually in the months of November and May on such days as may be fixed by the Governor-General or in the case of his inability, by the Secretary-General. Meetings are usually held in the City of New York.

GENERAL ASSEMBLIES.

The regular meetings of the General Society are termed "General Assemblies," and are held once every three years, at such time and place as the preceding General Assembly appoints.

SOCIETY OF COLONIAL WARS

IN THE

STATE OF OHIO.

OBJECTS OF THE SOCIETY.

The Society of Colonial Wars is instituted to perpetuate the memory of the events of American Colonial History, and of the men, who, in military and naval service, and in civil positions of trust and responsibility, by their acts or counsel assisted in the establishment, defense and preservation of the American Colonies, thereby laying the foundation of the Nation.

With this purpose in view, it seeks to collect and preserve manuscripts, rolls, relics and records; to provide suitable commemorations of events in Colonial History; and to inspire in its members the fraternal and patriotic spirit of their forefathers, and in the community, respect and reverence for those whose public service made our freedom and unity possible.

It differs from the ordinary Historical Societies, in aiming rather to popularize the results of historical investigation; to give life and color to the men and events of our grand formative epoch; while it requires certain social and ancestral qualifications on the part of its members.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR MEMBERSHIP.

Any male person above the age of twenty-one years of good moral character and reputation, is eligible to membership in the Society of Colonial Wars in the State of Ohio, who is lineally descended from an ancestor:—

1. Who fought in battle under Colonial authority prior to the year 1700.

2. Or, who served as a Governor, Deputy Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, or Member of the Council or Assembly, or as a Military, Naval or Marine Officer, in the service of the Colonies, or under the banner of Great Britain in North America; in the wars in which said Colonies participated or furnished troops, from the settlement of Jamestown, Virginia, May 13th, 1607, to the battle of Lexington, April 19th, 1775.

METHOD OF ADMISSION.

Gentlemen who are invited to become members, file with the Secretary preliminary applications, on forms provided for the purpose, stating the name, residence and services of the Colonial ancestors from whom they derive eligibility. If a preliminary application is satisfactory, the candidate is provided with formal application papers in duplicate, which must be subscribed by him, be approved by two members of the Society over their signatures, and contain the detailed pedigree of descent from a Colonial ancestor conferring eligibility. Supplemental lines of descent from other ancestors coming within the categories given above, are filed after admission, also in duplicate.

REQUIREMENTS.

All application papers, whether original or supplementary, in order to be acceptable, should conform to the following requirements:

1. The correctness of the pedigree should be proved by full references to authorities, giving title of work, volume and page, and in cases where the reference is to rare volumes, or to manuscripts, certified extracts should commonly accompany the application. The Membership Committee or the Registrar may at any time require such certified extracts.

2. No cyclopedias or family histories will be accepted as authority for the service or official position of an ancestor, but particular reference, giving title, volume and page, must be made to Documentary Records of the various Colonies, Published Archives, Proceedings of Congresses, Conventions, Assemblies, and Councils of the united or the several Colonies, or to Historical and Genealogical Works of a general character and of recognized importance and essential accuracy.

Reference for services to unprinted documents is to be supported by two type-written copies of such documents or the pertinent portions thereof, and by loan of the original documents to the Registrar, when possible, such originals to be returned to the applicant after verification.

3. All applications must be sworn to before a Notary, Commissioner, or, other proper officer, and be sealed by such officer if he have a seal. Original applications must be signed in approval by two members of the Society.

The above rules are essentially those required by the office of the Registrar-General, and all papers already in his office, or that may hereafter be received, will be judged by them. Any papers that are found to be defective or inaccurate will be returned by the Secretary to the applicant for correction.

After favorable report by the Committee, blanks shall be furnished to the candidate to set forth in detail the proofs of eligibility. Payment of initiation fees and dues shall be a requisite of membership.

Members will sign their names in the Membership Book of the Society.

The initiation fee shall be twenty-five dollars. The annual dues shall be five dollars, payable on the third Monday of November of each year. After this date, members who have not paid will be deemed in arrears and debarred from voting at the meetings of the Society. The payment at one time of seventy-five dollars, shall exempt the member so paying from annual dues.

ARTICLE VI.

COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP.

The Committee on Membership shall consist of five members, and shall hold office for a term of one year. Three members shall constitute a quorum, and a negative vote of two shall cause an adverse report to the Council on a candidate's application. The proceedings of the Committee shall be secret and confidential. A candidate who has been rejected by the Council, shall be ineligible for a space of one year from date of rejecting, except upon the unanimous vote of the Committee.

ARTICLE VII.

The Council shall appoint a nominating Committee of three members who are not officers, who, two weeks before the General Court of the Society, shall report to the Council a list of members to be voted for at the ensuing election, to succeed the officers, Gentlemen of the Council, and committees whose terms expire at such General Court. The officers, together with the Gentlemen of the Council and members of the Committees, shall be elected at the General Court by ballot. A plurality vote shall elect, and such officers and committees shall hold office for the period of one year, or, until their successors shall be duly elected and qualified.

Vacancies may be filled for the residue of the current year by the Council; provided, however, that the office of Governor or Secretary shall not be filled by the Committee when there shall be a Deputy Governor or Lieutenant Governor or Deputy Secretary to enter upon the duties. The Council may make proper provision for voting by members, not resident near the headquarters of the Society, and unable to be present at the General Court.

A DREAM OF COLONIAL EMPIRE.

When of old the question was asked, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" the speaker did not have in mind those six decades of American colonial history, to which we give the name of "the Neglected Period," nor that Adullamite band, the Colonial Royal Governors. On such an occasion as this, however, it is fitting to touch upon this comparatively uninteresting period of our history, if, perchance, we may find in it some great idea, or some commanding figure that will render its consideration worth while. It is with this in mind that I invite you to review with me "A Dream of Colonial Empire," and that I propose to introduce this dream by the previous visions of a Spanish missionary explorer and a French colonial expansionist, that serve to emphasize the foresight of an English royal governor, representative of the best that English loyalty combined with colonial tradition could produce.

It may seem that a Society of the Colonial Wars would be the last body in the world to extol the virtues of an English royal governor. Indeed, the office of chief colonial executive, associated as it is with such names as the time-serving Dudley, the debauched Cornbury, the reactionary Berkeley, the corrupt Culpepper, the merciless Tryon, bears a burden of incompetency, dishonesty, tactlessness, intrigue and treachery that have justly rendered it one of the hated landmarks of British rule in America; but as there are exceptions to all rules, it is to this exception that we will turn our attention, even if, perchance, the resulting contrast should, on the whole, render the office still more despised, and a more just cause for the succeeding Revolution. In order to bring this dreaming executive into more striking contrast, with those mentioned above, we will for a few minutes consider a French and a Spanish fore-runner.

In imagination let us consider ourselves transported to the boundless deserts of the Southwest, where, during the first quarter of the seventeenth century, in the valley of the Rio Grande, an humble missionary has as his task the spiritual cure of thousands of ignorant Indians. Led by a desire to extend his work to its utmost proportions, and fired by the reports of larger and more important Indian nations to the eastward, this humble Franciscan conceives the idea of carrying to those nations the gospel to which he has devoted his life, and at the same time of expanding the material interests of his king and nation. Filled with this determination, though incited only by the poverty stricken population of the desert, he suggests to the far-off Council of the Indies a plan worthy of the efforts of a Cortez, a Coronado, or a De Soto. His plan, briefly, is to extend his chain of missions to these remote Indian nations, to occupy a certain port on the Gulf of Mexico to which some forgotten earlier visitor had applied the name of the Holy Spirit, to connect this port with the Indian tribes in question, and, through them, to construct a highway to the valley of the Rio Grande. By means of the communication thus opened, he would bring the protecting arm of his king and the civilization of Old Spain directly into the interior of the American continent, and thus expand Spanish interests in church and state, rivet the hold of his nation irrevocably upon the western half of the Mississippi valley, and even extend it far to the eastward of that river. Such is the ambitious plan suggested by Friar Alonzo de Benavides, laboring in the deserts of New Mexico, but his projects, worthy of the century of Charles the Fifth, hardly appeal to a lesser age that feels the pride of the former, but lacks its power. The plan, as in the case of so many others, finds an appropriate resting place in the multitudinous archives of the Council of the Indies, and for half a century lies forgotten.

Leaving the friar and his neglected but worthy plan, let us turn our attention to another national representative, who, in this same region beholds the possibility of an important empire. The historic figure of LaSalle suggests all of those qualities that make a successful explorer, but there was in his mind a dream that demanded something more than the mere finding of highways over a continent, the exploiting of a trade in buffalo pelts, or even the opening of a trans-continental commerce with the far East. LaSalle beheld the vision of a vast future empire, drained by three mighty river systems, extending from an almost common source to the North, to the East, and to the South, and embracing in its area two-thirds of a continent. In pursuit of this dream he ascends the rivers of Canada, crosses the Great Lakes, opens a new highway to the Southwest, and finally in triumph, at the mouth of the great "Father of Waters", takes possession in the name of his Sovereign, of all the territory stretching from the Alleghenies to the Rockies, and from the uncertain Canadian region to the Gulf. In this illimitable expanse, by a chain of forts planted in the midst of the huts of coureurs de boils and of subject Indians; by means of a fur-trading fleet, accompanied by ever ready canoes, he proposed to establish the power of France and to curb the growing English colonies on the Atlantic Coast. His dream was of tremendous import, his means for fulfilling it apparently adequate, the prize seemed almost within his grasp, but the treacherous currents of the Gulf fatally thwarted his enterprise, and the more treacherous followers whom he could command but not inspire with loyalty or with his own great purpose, slew their chief; and thus was lost the opportunity for France to acquire an unshakable hold upon the Mississippi valley. It is true that other dreamers of the same nation realized in a small measure the possibilities of his scheme; that within less than two decades after his death a feeble French fort was founded on the Gulf, with a design to preoccupy the most bountiful valley in the world, and to protect the entire region of the Mississippi, with the fabulous Mexican mines beyond it, from the expansive cupidity of the English. Such was the undertaking Iberville hoped to achieve by a union of French and Spanish resources, and such the task which his untimely death left to his younger brother, Bienville; but the dying spirit of the Grand Monarch, opposed by Spanish conservatism, could not infuse life into the undertaking, so that such heroic sacrifices as these men and their predecessors represent counted for naught in the weaving of modern colonial empire.

With this introduction we may turn to the next national element entering into our dream-fabric of colonial empire, and introduce ourselves in the direct manner that our Virginian Governor himself would so greatly approve to a prince of royal executives, hailing from the borderland of Scotland, that frontier that has developed so many sturdy characters for the world's conflicts. Brought up in the spirit of the established church, a faith for which his ancestors had suffered at the hands of the Covenanters; the son of a physician who had long been stationed in an English garrison at Tangier, on the African coast, there was much in the family history and traditions of Alexander Spottswood, in his training and early environment, to render him an insistent supporter of the royal prerogative, and at the same time a chieftain of no mean repute on the frontier of civilization. That he was no Democrat in his opinions can be shown by his statement, "I cannot forbear regretting that I must always have to do with the representatives of your vulgar people, and mostly with such members [i. e. of the legislative assembly], as are of their stamp and character. As long as half an acre will qualify an elector, the meaner sort of people will always carry elections, and their humor runs to choose such men as are their most familiar companions." Such an opinion, candidly expressed, soon rendered him unacceptable to most of the people over whom he ruled, so that it is not at all surprising that on one occasion, when celebrating his Majesty's birthday, they did not invite the Governor to the public bonfire, and took no more notice of him "than as if there were none in the palace." He goes on to say, however, "I cannot but attribute these miscarriages to the people's mistaken choice of a set of representatives whom heaven has not endowed with the ordinary qualifications requisite to legislators." Such a man would hardly remain on good terms with his various legislative assemblies, and so, in the end, we are not surprised to find them successfully petitioning for his recall, but fortunately, not until he had rendered Virginia, and through her, all the English colonies in America, an inestimable public service.

Despite his hostile attitude toward the popular assembly, Spotswood greatly exerted himself in the development of Virginia's resources. The culture of the vine and of tobacco, the improvement of the beef supply, the establishment of iron works, the development of the militia service, the suppression of piracy, the encouragement of education, as shown in the bequeathing of his library to William and Mary College, the erection of mission schools among the Indians on the frontier, timely assistance to his neighbors in their Indian wars, a general strengthening of royal interests everywhere, the control of the Indian trade, and assistance to German immigration—these services prove the value of his rule, and emphasize the stamp which he left upon British colonial administration.

It is in Spotswood the expansionist, however, that we meet with the great figure in English colonial history. From the beginning of his administration he had urged the erection of forts on the frontier, and the settlement of tributary Indians near them, for the purpose of securing the colony against external enemies. He had urged the extension of these fortified posts until they should stretch beyond the Alleghenies to the Great Lakes, and even to the Mississippi; for, as he states in one of his earlier letters, "since the French are endeavoring to settle a communication between Canada and the Mississippi by way of the lakes, our people would; by pushing on their settlements in one straight line along the James River, be able to cut off that communication and fix ourselves so strongly there that it would not be in the power of the French to dislodge them." In furtherance of this theory, soon after his arrival in 1710, he sent out a company of adventurers, who, as he reports, "Had found the mountains not above one hundred miles from our upper inhabitants, and who went up to the top of the highest mountain with their horses, though they had hitherto been thought to be impassable, and they assured me that a descent on the other side seemed to be as easy as that they had passed on this; and that they could have passed over the whole ledge, which is not large, if the season of the year had not been too far advanced before they set out on their expedition." He went on to say that he could establish a very profitable trade with the Indians along this line of proposed fortifications, because his traders would thus have a base of supplies near at hand.

It was not until six years had passed that Spottswood was able to realize his cherished desire of exploring this western country and noting in person the possibilities of English advancement in that direction. In the late summer of 1716 the members of that famous company, later known as the "Knights of the Golden Horseshoe," led by the Governor in person, and accompanied by a retinue of servants loaded with provision for an enjoyable western outing, set out from Spottswood's establishment on the Rappahannock. His chief aim, as he later stated, was "to satisfy myself whether it was practicable to come at the lakes." He penetrated to the height of the Blue Ridge in the vicinity of Harper's Ferry, and there, with faces toward the West, he and his company drank in succession to the health of his royal Master and all the members of his household as long, if we may believe contemporary report, as the plentiful stock of champagne and other varieties of wine permitted. Possibly it was because of these plentiful potations that he later reported that it was possible to pass in three days from the point where he and his company then stood to a river entering the Western lakes, and, that from one of the ranges farther to the west, Lake Erie itself was visible, although five days journey distant. Whatever we may think of this geographical reconnaissance, as a precedent for future Societies of the Colonial Wars in the region thus dimly viewed, the survey through the same upturned bottles seems to have been politically more important, for he could report later to the Lords of Trade, not only rumors of extensive French settlements in Louisiana, but of a French advance along Lake Erie that threatened to engross the fur trade west of the mountains, to cross the mountain barrier itself, and to seize the positions which were the gateways to the English coast settlements. Fired by this danger he strongly urged the occupation of these same positions in order to protect the frontier of the Southern colonies, and a counter advance into the region beyond, where, by the establishment of a fort or forts along the Great Lakes, they might break the French routes joining Canada and Louisiana. He had often regretted, he states, "that after so many years as these countries have been seated, no attempt has been made to discover the sources of our rivers, nor to establish correspondence with those nations of Indians to the westward of us even after certain knowledge of the progress of the French in surrounding us with their settlements."

From the information obtained upon this famous journey, from various Indian tribes, and from other Colonial Governors, he later reported with substantial correctness the details of the French methods of expansion. "By these communications," he writes, "and the forts which they have already built, they may engross the whole skin trade, and may send out such bodies of Indians on the back of these plantations as may greatly distress His Majesty's subjects here. If they multiply their settlements so as to join their Dominion of Canada to their colony of Louisiana, they may then even possess themselves of any of these plantations." He goes on to suggest the occupation of Lake Erie, and shows from his rather uncertain geographical knowledge that the English on Lake Erie would be better situated as regards their base of supplies than their French rivals.

In these random extracts describing Spottswood's famous journey, we have not only observations drawn from a holiday excursion that is most interesting in itself, but indications of a settled purpose to advance national interests, arising from a significant vision of the future colonial empire beyond the Alleghenies. It was not Spottswood's good fortune to realize his dream, but it is to his credit that when the inevitable struggle with the Assembly resulted in his removal from office, he did not forsake his colonial home to spend his hard-earned salary in the mother country, but rather cast his fortunes as a private individual into the up-building of his adopted home-land; and from his seat upon the Rapidan, in the woods that still bear his name, he devoted himself to developing the material resources of the colony in preparation for the inevitable struggle for the mastery of the continent. Death came to him, as was fitting, while on the point of taking command of an expedition against one of the rival colonial powers that he feared, but he died full of honors and respected even by those who had opposed his policy as Governor. His vastly weaker successor, Dinwiddie, was given the opportunity of initiating the struggle that Spottswood predicted, the first event of which occurred at the junction of the Allegheny and the Monongahela, within the "five days" journey from the crest of the Blue Ridge, and it occurred as Spottswood had predicted, in the attempt to seize one of the natural gateways to the mountains. When Fort Duquesne became Fort Pitt, when Johnson accepted the surrender of Niagara, French communication between Louisiana and Canada was broken, as Spottswode had suggested, and it needed only the final stroke on the Plains of Abraham, to decide which of the great colonial dreamers had the clearest vision of the future control of the American continent.

THE PILGRIMS NEITHER PURITANS NOR PERSECUTORS

BEFORE THE SOCIETY OF COLONIAL WARS

NOVEMBER 25th, 1904

BY B. R. COWEN

Governor and Fellow Members of the Ohio Society of Colonial Wars:—

When your Secretary, a few days ago, asked me to give you something tonight which might take the place of the usual "feast of reason," following the commissariat, before accepting, I drew from him the suggestion that "any old thing" would do, or words to that effect. On that hint I agreed to stand up here and say something on some subject.

A few days ago I was signally honored by being listened to with remarkable patience by the Society of Mayflower Descendants, to a paper specially prepared for their "Compact Day" observance.

Mindful of what your Secretary had suggested, it occurred to me that if the Mayflower Society could stand it, this Society of Colonial Wars, composed exclusively of the sterner and stronger sex, ought to be possessed of at least an equal degree of patience and fortitude. This and the lack of time to prepare something more fitting for this occasion, decided me to give you the Mayflower paper.

Those of you who were present on "Compact Day," and heard this paper, can of course avoid the double infliction by a quiet withdrawal, which will not be looked upon as a discourtesy under the circumstances.

There were colonies and colonies; colonists and colonists in those days. The Plymouth Pilgrims were colonists, and the settlers at Massachusetts Bay and Salem were colonists, but there the resemblance ceases. Those of Massachusetts Bay and Salem were not Plymouth Pilgrims in any sense, but Puritans in all the name implies. The Plymouth Pilgrims were not Puritans in the ordinary sense of the term, but a people apart from the intolerance and persecution which cast a dark shadow over the history of that 17th century religio-political immigration.

To show that fact was the main purpose of the writer in the preparation of this paper.

According to Aristotle the story of an epic poem must be on a grand and noble theme; it must be one in itself. Where in all the wide range of human history shall we find a grander or nobler theme than in the initial voyage of the Mayflower, which bore to the forbidding shores of this New World the germ of our present day civilization?

For centuries the world has studied the fascinating epics of the "blind bard of rocky Chios" as the crown jewel of classic culture. Could the sage wanderer of the Odyssey have extended his travels so far and so long, what a theme worthy of his muse could he not have found in the simple story of the immortal band, who, turning their backs on all that was dear to them in tradition and history, and memory, launched their frail bark on an uncharted sea in search of a land where thought might be free and life and conscience untrammelled by the fetters of caste and the enforced dogmas of a spiritual tyranny. No subject in all the history of the race since Moses led his hosts through the parted sea, lends itself so fully to the facile pen of a Homer or a Milton as does the story of that Pilgrim exodus of 1620, and no subject has received so little honor at the hands of those, who, in the modest grandeur of its conception and the glory of its achievement, could have woven it into an epic second in grandeur and nobility to none in all our literature.

Descent from those who bore the lighted torch of our spiritual and political enfranchisement to these shores on that initial voyage is your patent of nobility; not so ancient as the Golden Fleec and Roman Eagle, but more honorable and more to be desired than the Star and Garter, or any other order of any time.

Those of us whose forbears joined the Plymouth colony three years later in the Ann and Little James, although usually classed as "first comers," must ever fall short of the highest honor which is your birthright.

What is it that renders those first comers worthy of honor above those who followed? In the first place they were pioneers in all the name implies; adventurers, if you please, though in the best sense of the term; explorers, who, leaving all, risking all, daring all, looked forward only toward "the mark of their high calling." Nor terrors of the great deep, nor dangers seen and unseen, nor perils of savages, nor perils of climate; nor lurking diseases could frighten them from their appointed destiny.

Whether their quickened spiritual perceptions gave them clairvoyant vision of the magnificent future of their enterprise we may not know, as their annals give no sign. Like all pioneers in a great cause, however, since the world was, it is certain, "They builded better than they knew."

If we look for providential guidance in their enterprise to explain their success, it is there so distinctly that "he who runs may read." It is there as distinctly as it was afore time in parted sea and cloven rock and pillar of fire and cloud, so that I am tempted to say the undevout descendant of the Mayflower Pilgrims is mad.

The community at Leyden, from which the first Mayflower contingent was drawn, was made up of representatives of all the different classes of English life outside the ranks of the so-called nobility. Of their precise social status prior to their first immigration we are ignorant. All were noted in the annals of Plymouth as more or less skilled in some manual industry whereby to earn a livelihood, and yet we know there were men of education and gentility among them. It is quite a mistake to imagine that the English people of title, were or are all true aristocracy, or that those not of so called gentle birth were void of gentility, for—

“Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith, than Norman blood.”

When these Pilgrims left their English homes they were compelled to sacrifice their worldly possessions and their social prestige to escape an ecclesiastical bondage which had become too grievous to be borne, and this imposed on them a resort to manual labor necessary for their subsistence.

Furthermore, Green, in his “History of the English People,” says: “Their common call, their common brotherhood in Christ annihilated in the minds of the Puritans that overpowering sense of social distinction which characterized the age of Elizabeth. The meanest peasant felt himself ennobled as a child of God. The proudest noble recognized a spiritual equality in the poorest saint.”

What was this obliteration of all social distinctions; this voluntary entry upon a life of labor and of rigid self denial during their Holland sojourn, but the method adopted to enure them to the hardships and the stern duties of the wilderness life in store for them, developing that capacity for industry and endurance so essential to the success of their enterprise.

It is interesting in this connection to consider whether these men and women could have been induced to embark for America without their Holland probation. Would not the terrors, real and imaginary, of such an experiment have been sufficient to intimidate them? Could they have been tempted from their pleasant English homes to such an unknown destination.

Again, for thirty years a cruel war between Spain and the United Provinces had been waged, in which Holland had been overrun and devastated and the flower of her sturdy manhood destroyed. In all that long and bloody period Holland would have proven an inhospitable retreat for a people seeking religious freedom. Yet was it so chosen by that devoted band. Was it a mere coincidence that almost at the same time, but before the truce, the pilgrims arrived in Holland, there was a suspension of hostilities between the contending forces and the declaration of a truce for twelve years?

So that for twelve years of their sojourn in Leyden they enjoyed a period of peace and quiet they could not have found in England, nor in Holland in the preceding thirty years under the wasting campaigns of bloody Alva.

The twelve years truce was drawing to a close; hostilities with Spain would, in all probability, be resumed. Under the Absolutism so thoroughly exemplified by Spain, the last condition of the Pilgrims would have been far worse than the first.

Then, too, a longer sojourn, even had the truce been prolonged, might have resulted in an assimilation destructive of their identity as a chosen people. They might have lost their nationality, their language, their traditions, as did the Huguenots in Germany, Holland, England and America. They came to Leyden an organized community, and absorption was something to be dreaded as destructive of their entire theory of life. They were determined to preserve their English speech, their English traditions; keep their organization intact and find some spot where they might lay in peace the corner stone of a great Christian state.

The spirit of nationality was strong in them. The spirit of self government was strong in them, and the only policy which could satisfy those feelings was such a migration as the world had not seen since the Tyrians came to Carthage.

It was too late to find a field on which to exploit their scheme on that continent. Europe was already too crowded for the purpose. The only available place seemed to be this New World, where at that time Anglo Saxon Liberalism and Latin Absolutism were contending for the mastery.

By this voluntary isolation in their Holland sojourn, their alien speech, their peculiar religious creed and practice, at once, spiritual and political, was developed that capacity for self government inherent in the Anglo Saxon; that political training combining civil liberty with respect for law, enabling every town and village and hamlet to govern itself without disturbing or impairing the national unity so important as a prerequisite to success in founding a colony.

It is no part of my present purpose to give in detail the incidents of the Mayflower's first voyage. It is enough to say that on the 16th of September 1620, with 102 passengers, old and young, she set sail from Old Plymouth, and 66 days later dropped anchor in Cape Cod harbor. Deceived and betrayed by her consort, the Speedwell, deserted by one-sixth of their comrades, yet undismayed they pursued their enterprise. The picturesque history of that memorable voyage has been preserved in the pure and vigorous English of Gov. Bradford, to which we are indebted for the most of our knowledge of the Plymouth migration and the causes which led up to it, a careful study of which is commended to all fair minded students of that most interesting chapter in our early history.

We may search the contemporary annals in vain for any notice of this voyage, so pregnant with the seeds of a new civilization. Hunted from their English homes, imprisoned as criminals, many of their comrades executed as felons, stripped of their worldly possessions, glad to escape to a foreign land, and now poorly equipped, their forlorn condition only excited the contempt and scorn of the ruling powers of England, and they were no doubt regarded if looked upon at all, much as we of to-day would look upon a cargo of tramps, involuntarily leaving their country for their country's good.

Up to the moment of their embarking; yes, up to their landing at New Plymouth, the enterprise had not assumed sufficient importance to attract the slightest public attention or interest. Had the Mayflower gone down in mid-ocean with her precious freight, no mention of the enterprise would probably have found a place in history. She would have left no more trace of her existence on the page of history than on the heaving waves which had engulfed her.

The known history of the choice of a final landing place leaves much room for doubt whether the landing at Plymouth was the result of choice or accident. The discussions on that question as the ship lay at Cape Cod indicate a division of opinion as to a landing place. That division gave rise to dissensions, which grew to threats of revolt, which, if unchecked, might become dangerous to the welfare of the colony.

A location near the Hudson River was decided upon, and an effort was made to reach it. But stress of weather and threatening shoals and breakers compelled a return, and Plymouth was finally decided upon.

This radical change of destination increased the dissensions referred to which threatened the harmony of the community. Some "lewd fellows of the baser sort," hired laborers, threatened to break loose on landing and enjoy full license.

Pastor Robinson, in his farewell letter, had enjoined the necessity for some mode of civil government, and the time had now come to act on that injunction. In the cabin of the Mayflower, in Cape Cod harbor, Nov. 11-21, 1620, was therefore drawn up the first written constitution in the world's history.

In that compact lies our Declaration of Independence, our Bill of Rights, our American Constitution. Its adoption was a passing at one step from the old era of privilege and force to the new era of due submission and obedience to just and equal offices and laws for our better ordering and preservation.

If the fifty-six signers of the Declaration of Independence are held in immortal honor for that action a century and a half later, what shall we say of this little handful of forty-one, humble and unknown persons breaking the last link that bound them to Europe, and placing modern society firmly and tranquilly on its new foundation? Well may you be proud of such ancestry. You whose forbears achieved so much, need not point to Lexington, or Bunker Hill, or Independence Hall. Your claim is superior to all later imitators.

The tone of that instrument and the success of those who framed it furnish a valuable object lesson to revolutionists. These men had suffered, as few men have suffered. They were familiar with the inside of noisome, 17th century, English prisons. Many of their brethren had suffered death for the cause. "For less," said Goldwin Smith, "the Jacobins sought to sever the present from the past with guillotine, flung the illustrious dead out of their tombs and began history with the year One."

Hear the text of that compact:

"In the name of God, Amen."

"We, whose names are underwritten, the loyal subjects of our dread sovereign, Lord King James, by the grace of God, of Great Britain and Ireland, defender of the faith, etc., having undertaken, for the glory of God and the advancement of the Christian faith and honor of our King and country, a voyage to plant the first colony in the Northern parts of Virginia, do by these presents solemnly and mutually, in the presence of God and of one another, covenant and combine ourselves together unto a civil body politic for our better ordering and preservation, and for the furtherance of the ends aforesaid, and by virtue hereof to exact, constitute and frame such just and equal laws, ordinances, acts, constitutions and offices from time to time as shall be thought most meet for the general good of the colony, unto which we promise all due submission and obedience.

"In witness whereof we have hereunder subscribed our names at Cape Cod, the 11th of November, in the year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord, King James of England, France and Ireland, the 18th, and of Scotland the fifty-fourth. Anno Domini, 1620."

Thus are the springs of our civilization, unlike those of the older worlds, revealed in the clear light of history. In appearance, puny and insignificant; in reality, forceful and abundant. Acting at the source of things agencies otherwise weak became powerful for good, or evil, and men lost sight of under other conditions in the jostling modern crowd stand out as the agents of destiny. The diplomacy of Brewster and Bradford and the strategy of Myles Standish had to do with problems of as deep import to posterity as those of to-day, where Roosevelt and Hay and Taft are pitted against the powers in the struggle of the nations. Thus did the Plymouth Pilgrims contribute to the fulfillment of the prophecy of the gallant but unfortunate Raleigh. "America shall be English and Free."

While the men of the Mayflower, arrogating to themselves the role of superiority, as men do now, were framing the compact of civil government, the women of the company, always practical and no less mindful of the future success and harmony of matters in their own particular domain, inaugurated what has become a great national institution, the Monday washday, anticipating by more than one hundred years the familiar theological dogma of John Wesley: "Cleanliness is next to godliness." Purified physically and strengthened spiritually by this worship of cleanliness, they once more set sail and brought up at the Rock of Plymouth, the foundation of our civil and religious liberty.

In the choice of a permanent landing place, the good Providence which had attended them hitherto, did not forsake them. The Patuxets, a powerful and warlike tribe of Indians, which had but a short time before occupied that territory, had been swept away by a pestilence, which had also reduced the neighboring and affiliated tribes known as the Pokanokets, from an effective fighting force of three thousand warriors to a bare five hundred. So that the chosen location had been prepared for their coming, in that no Indian foe was left to meet them and dispute their occupancy.

Of the original one hundred and two Mayflower immigrants, one half died in the first eleven months, forty-four of whom died in the first four months, including 28 out of the 48 adult men. That awful mortality tells the story of their hardships. Yet on the 5th day of April, when the Mayflower set sail on her homeward voyage, with but half her former crew, the rest having succumbed to the epidemic of the winter, she carried back not one of the emigrants, distressing as had been the experience of the winter and discouraging as was their immediate prospect. Their thoughts, like homing birds, must have gone back to the shaded lanes and budding hedges of their English homes, but their devotion to duty and destiny held them steadfast to their chosen enterprise.

But the survivors were of tougher fibre, and their subsequent average was thirty-four years. So that, but for the unavoidable exposure in landing or had the landing been effected two months earlier, as it would have been, but for the cruel and criminal desertion of the Speedwell, the longevity of those colonists would have compared favorably with our present day conditions, thanks to their frugal and equable lives.

Carver, the first governor, was one of the early dead. But he was survived by Bradford, the competent historian, for thirty years their governor and leader; Brewster, their spiritual leader, thoroughly imbued with the broad and catholic spirit of the beloved Robinson; and Standish, who, if we accept Longfellow's beautiful story as history—which it is not—while a laggard in love, was by no means a dastard in war, for a dozen years was the stalwart defender of the feeble colony against foes without and foes within.

In the history of this feeble colony—feeble in numbers only—their suffering and sacrifices we have another illustration of God's method of making men and women that are real men and women, and not mere puppets. It is through suffering and by struggle, and there is no better way.

The Plymouth Colonists were the representatives of all that was best in that Puritanism which was the embodiment of that spiritual force whose self appointed office it was to challenge Imperialism in England. The two are natural and implacable enemies, everywhere and always. Their ideas of everything: of government, of industry, of education, of mortality, of religion, are irreconcilably hostile. The latter is the lineal successor of Imperial Rome. The former finds its inspiration in the Hebrew Constitution.

Green, in his History of the English People, says: "England became the people of a book, and that book the Bible." From that source not only their religious, but their social and political ideas were drawn. There they saw with clearest vision that condition of social equality which became one of their most forceful characteristics, and which is still radical and masterful in these latter days.

While Cromwell and Hamden and Pym were waging the great battle against that Imperialism, and in behalf of Judaic fraternalism on the tented field, these Plymouth Pilgrims were quietly, but effectually preparing the soil for a generous fruitage, which was to come in the fullness of time. So it was that Roundhead and Cavalier fought the fight to a finish at Marston, at Nasby and Dunder, where Imperialism fell to rise no more in England.

In what I have said of the Plymouth Pilgrims I am not unmindful of the fact that there are others, who, after the manner of campaign managers, before election "claim everything" for their own particular ancestry, and ignore the influence of the New England contingent.

Thus we have Holland societies, and Huguenot societies, and Scotch Irish societies, and Jewish societies, to read the claims of which we must be forced to the conclusion that our ancestors were not "in it" to any controlling extent in that formative period. John Fiske says of those claims "Your Ulsterman is clear that the immigrants to Virginia and New England were small affairs compared with the immigration from Ulster to Pennsylvania; your Huguenot sees in men of his race and faith the chief builders of the United States, and statements are made about the Jew which seem quite incompatible with the size of the home market for pork."

Unfortunately the research on which these claims, reliable as much of it undoubtedly is, has not always been conducted with the true historic spirit, but too often gives evidence of prejudice and efforts to bolster up preconceived theories. But I am not here to pass upon those claims, nor to detract from the credit that may be due to others. All contributed to the grand result, and are entitled to honor in proportion to that contribution. I hold a brief to-day for the Plymouth Pilgrims, whose we are.

It is well nigh impossible at this late day to undertake a refutation of the generally accepted story of Puritan intolerance, bigotry and persecution as applied to the Plymouth Pilgrims. They have suffered in reputation for the misdeeds of others. They were neither Puritans nor persecutors. Imbibing the spirit of their pastor, Robinson, and inspired by the noble sentiments and wise injunctions of his farewell letter, they were men of simple faith, enduring courage and fidelity to conscience rarely found in the history of any other community. Through all their practice ran a vein of charity and love, lighting up their history and touching the heart with warmth and feeling.

Pastor John Robinson, "father of the Independents," was a Cambridge graduate, a man of great sweetness of character, and distinguished for a broad and tolerant habit of mind too seldom found among the Puritans of that day! Friendly and unfriendly writers alike bear witness to his spirit of christian charity and the comparatively slight value which he attached to orthodoxy in points of doctrine." We can hardly be wrong," says John Fiske, "in supposing that the comparatively tolerant behavior of the Plymouth Pilgrims, in which they contrasted strongly with the Puritans of Massachusetts Bay and other localities, was in large measure due to the abiding influence of this admirable man."

At a later day the Plymouth colonists were to some extent overrun by those who brought the harrow Puritan spirit so rampant in other communities, but even the hardness and cruelty thus imported was mitigated and softened by the prevailing liberality.

In 1631 the ship Lyon brought from Bristol to Boston a young Welshman, Roger Williams, by name, a Cambridge graduate and protege of Sir Edward Coke. He was heralded on his arrival as a "godly minister," and two years later we find him as assistant to Ralph Smith, the settled minister at Plymouth. That fact and his subsequent expulsion is sometimes charged to the intolerance of the Plymouth people. The fact is, however, that Williams found the atmosphere of Plymouth too liberal for the display of his rigid policy, asked and received his dismissal from the Plymouth society, and went to Salem, where, for a time, at least, he found more congenial surroundings. His more serious troubles came later, for which, however, the Plymouth people were in no way responsible.

"The fiction of his persecution by the Pilgrims," says a historian, "has been so often reported that it is difficult now to substitute the true story that the Christian charity which tolerated in the Plymouth colony, even open adherents to the English Church offended his bigoted spirit and drove him to more congenial climes."

Looking at Puritanism as it was exemplified in the other colonies, however, our conclusions must be different."

"At the outset," says Parkinan, "New England was unfaithful to the principle of her existence. Seldom has religious tyranny assumed a form more aggressive than among the Puritan exiles. New England protestantism appealed to liberty and then closed the door against her. On a stock of freedom she grafted a scion of despotism; yet the vital juices of the root penetrated at last to the uttermost branches and nourished them to an irrepressible strength and expansion."

It is quite common to refer to the Puritans with an irony too often malicious, while those not of their lineage are wont to speak of them with scorn and ridicule. But while we ridicule we imitate many of the peculiarities which give rise to that ridicule.

Did it ever occur to you to what extent we are imitators of those peculiarities which excited the scorn of the ribald wits and poets of the Courts of the Stuarts?

"Roundhead" was a term of contempt because of the fashion in which the followers of Cromwell wore their hair, so different from the flowing locks affected by the Cavaliers. With us the long haired man is a cowboy, a museum freak, or, a crank.

They rejected the gaudy colors and flowing laces of polite society, and adopted sober and even sombre shades in their attire. An American audience of gentlemen to-day is no less sombre in dress. They condemned bear baiting, then a popular diversion. Macaulay said this was not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators. They also forbade all pugilistic encounters. Our laws forbid both under severe penalties.

They forbade the drama. Where in all this country, questionable as are many of our dramatic exhibitions, would the plays of the reign of the Stuarts be tolerated?

Literature, ever a thing of slow growth, was retarded by the severity of a system that required everything; personal, intellectual and spiritual to be garbed in theological fashion. But, whatever else may be said of that literature it differed widely from the English literature of that day in that it was and has remained pure.

Be it remembered that the Puritans came from a world where the Inquisition, St. Bartholomew, the Bloody Assizes and the Thirty Years War were possible. Those institutions and that war had drunk the blood of millions, and the demon of their persecution was still unsated. The demon of the Puritans was sated with the blood of four Quakers, and even these had refused all warnings, and openly courted their own martyrdom.

With popular government the Puritans early established popular education, and we are indebted to them for our system of common schools. In their most dangerous and critical period they laid the foundation of a college, the first in the new World, which stands to-day among the foremost in the world.

They rejected primogeniture, that relic of the Middle Ages, at the very outset, and adopted equal inheritance which became the basis of our Republican institutions. So that it is fair to say that the essential good that was in the Puritan system has endured and vindicated its justice and propriety, while that which was shameful, the intolerance and persecution, soon passed away and was forgotten.

It was no part of the purpose of this paper at its outset to undertake any defense of the Puritan, nor to refer to him except in so far as was necessary to differentiate him from the Plymouth Pilgrims, whose day this is, and whose descendants you are. The glowing story of the latter stands forth as a beacon light at the threshold of our history. Nothing we can say can add to their solid merit or to the modest greatness of their achievement.

"Words pass as wind, but where great deeds were done,
A power abides transformed from sire to son;
The boy feels deeper meanings thrill his ear,
That, tingling through his pulse lifelong shall run
With sure impulsion to keep honor clear,"
When, pointing down, his father whispers: "Here,
Where we stand stood the purely great,
Whose soul no siren passion could unsphere,
The nameless, now a power and mixed with fate."
